

A Free Enquiry Into the Origin of the Fourth Gospel (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Free Enquiry Into the Origin of the Fourth Gospel Many people are deterred from the perusal of works bearing on the authenticity of the Gospels by the feeling that they are wanting in the erudition which they deem necessary for the proper understanding of the subject. I make no pretension to the possession of erudition. The chief characteristic of this work may be said to be that it is one in the perusal of which common sense is necessary, but erudition not necessary. As erudition is not necessary for the perusal of the English version of the Gospels, it is equally unnecessary for the perusal of this work, which treats of one Gospel chiefly, and incidentally of the other three. All that is really needed by the reader is the exercise of common sense. In this work is set forth the discovery of the real author of the Fourth Gospel, which has hitherto been erroneously attributed to the Apostle John. That discovery followed upon the discovery of the substitution of the little word water for dove in John xix. 34. Theologians, I believe, are now agreed that the Synoptic Gospels are not original writings, but were based on writings that preceded them: but what those antecedent writings were could not be ascertained. I trust I have definitely indicated in Chapter IV. the sources from which the Synoptic writers derived their information.
