

Arms Control: Realism and Norms nadir International Society and Law. (London Security Policy Study Book 36)

The world is typified by 1) an international community/society that constructs norms codified in treatise by which states entertain arms control processes, 2) states that view the world as power politics/realism dependent upon the role of the hegemonic power/s in imposing processes of non-proliferation and counter-proliferation 3) rogue states and terrorist organizations flouting diplomacy and pursuing the development and acquisition of weapons of mass destruction (WMD). Inherent to differences between international order and international anarchy are treaty commitments generating regimes that contribute to a growing institutionalization of international relations. The adherence to these are by-and-large self-regulatory given inherent difficulties in monitoring and verification. States (rogue) and non-state entities (terrorists) not party to these treatise and regimes have provoked the hegemonic power, America, in the 21st Century to abrogate liberalism for realism in enforcing compliance to arms control norms and in effecting disarmament through regime change. Do arms control treatise constitute a legalization of international politics and/or does the use of force by the hegemonic state constitute legality in maintaining international order against international anarchy?
