Not illustrated. 1890 Excerpt: ... By and by the dreary round of factory life became distasteful, as it was bound to do to one possessed of such an energetic and lively nature; and leaving Galashiels, Mr Forsyth started hotel-keeping in Edinburgh. From Edinburgh he migrated to Aberdeen, where he established Forsyths Hotel, and in 1863 he settled in the Cobden Hotel, Glasgow, where he was so successful that he was ultimately able to leave its management on younger shoulders, that he might have more time in which to indulge his much-loved angling and genial literary pursuits. His leisure, however, was not of long duration, for he died, after a brief illness, in 1889. For many years Mr Forsyth enjoyed a wide circle of literary and artistic friends, and among knights of the rod and reel whom he knew, and who are, alas! no more, he named Alex. Russel, of the Scotsman; Thomas Tod Stoddart, author of The Anglers Companion; James Cassie, R.S.A., and others not unknown to fame. A prominent member of the St. Mungo Angling Club, he sang its life and action in vigorous verse, in A Lay of Loch-leven, by Willum o ye West, published by Robert Forrester, Glasgow. This volume extends to 108 pages, and is profusely illustrated with members portraits, &c. The members were so charmed by its first recital that they unanimously voted its immediate publication. The author complied, but not without fears, he says, that in his rashness he had failed to act upon the wisdom of the old proverb which avows that a man wi riven breeks should sit still. Our author did not require to be so modest about the matter, for the poem is a clever production. Recently, says Mr Ford, from whom we have these details, I was privileged to scan a long poem by Mr Forsyth, mainly remin...
