Not illustrated.1821 Excerpt: ... THE HISTORY OF SCOTLAND FROM THE YEAR M.DC.LX. Since it is the great design of historians to instruct posterity by the example of their predecessors, I think it most reasonable that we should incline rather to write and read our own history than those of strangers, and those of the present than those of more removed ages, as suiting better with the times and tempers of those who are to be instructed. And seeing it is the great advantage of history, that it rather informs our judgment than satisfies our curiosity, I think that those historians are most to be read and considered, who inform us not only of the great affairs of the world, wherein few are concernd besides princes and great counsellors, who make up the least part of readers, but such as descend to make observations upon all sorts of people who lived in the age of which they write; and acquainting us with the rise and circumstances of all that then past, and the motives from which the resolutions then taken were prest, do make us wise as well as learnd, and teach us not only what was done, but what we ought to do. But because our country-men are more willing to do those things that deserve to be recorded than to write what others have done, I am resolved to embrace the last, since I cannot attain to the first; and possibly I may this way, since I can by no other, somewhat curb the insolence of such as, though they fear not the opposition of their country-men, will possibly fear the censure of posterity. Yet pretend I not to write a history, but to leave upon record such observations only as my intelligence could allow me to know, and my other employments to digest: but I may without vanity promise that no man hath writ an history who knew more intimately the designs, and observd more narrowly a...
