

Bay St Louis Discovered: Hancock County

Bay St. Louis Discovered by Dan Ellis
The cover features the wooden-framed Hancock County Courthouse as constructed in 1874 and later renovated. The county seat was moved a couple of times before it was established in Shieldsboro, now Bay St. Louis. When Hancock County was first established it included land between the Pearl River on the West and Biloxi Bay on the East. It was later reduced in several stages to create three new counties Harrison, Stone and Pearl River. Sun-Herald book reviewer Nan Patton Ehrbright describes the book as including chapters on Bay St. Louis, Old Town, Churches, organizations, and the builders who constructed the countys historic buildings. And, a section featuring the countys early hotels, businesses, and shop owners. A number of the current businesses in the Bay area are also highlighted. The book liberally illustrated with photos, drawings, and maps sweeps through the countys history from its first settlement to its current growth stages with such significant cities of Waveland and Bay St. Louis and community developments at the Kiln and Diamondhead and the NASA complex. The material gathered from the earliest historic incidents was garnered from many resource documents from the courthouse, newspaper clippings from the Historical Society and the Public Library, and from personal interviews of longtime residents. All of the early churches that still exist today are briefly described with accompanying photographs from the early times to the present. A history of the Bay-Waveland Yacht club is richly staged from the early regattas to its current reorganized club facility. Ellis, a former educator and business owner, has published more than a dozen books in his heritage legacy series, and is a contributing writer to several publications and an accomplished public speaker.
