

This is a remarkably good book. It is on the one hand an insightful and sympathetic interpretation by a careful observer of a people and place as represented by the Miskito Indian village of Tasbapauni (population about 1000) on the rain-drenched eastern coast of Nicaragua. At the same time it is a critical conceptual analysis of the nature of native subsistence and their adaptability/resilience in the face of such potentially disruptive factors as population increases, the rising expectations of its members, and the demands of foreign markets.
